Allison Beeby Lonsdale questions this view. In her innovative book, she explores the idea that translation is a gift that one either has or does not have. Many professional translators believe the ability to translate is a talent that one is born with or lacks. But this view is challenged by Beeby Lonsdale, who argues that translation is not a天赋, but rather a skill that can be learned and developed.

In her book, Beeby Lonsdale discusses the intertextual dialogue, leads to a discussion of the redactional process and the historical and social contexts in which the book was written. She examines the intellectual context of the book, biblical and extrabiblical textual traditions on which the book is based and with which it is in dialogue. Likewise, it will discuss the style, the syntax, and the vocabulary. The examination of the commentary presents a literary analysis of the text, taking into account the inclusion and arrangement of different pericopes, and an analysis of the narration. Beeby Lonsdale highlights the importance of understanding the redactions and the historical context in which the book was written.

The book is essential reading for those interested in the consequences of globalization on children's literature and culture. Emer O'Sullivan traces the history of comparative children's literature studies, from the enthusiastic internationalism of the post-war period – which set out from the idea of a supra-national world republic of childhood – to modern comparative children's literature studies. She outlines the constituent areas that structure the field, including contact and transfer studies, intertextuality studies, intermediality studies and image criticism. Drawing on the scholarship and children's literature of many cultures and languages, she provides a comprehensive overview of the field and its development.

decades. Drawing on work at the intersection of narrative theory and translation studies, the volume highlights the ways in which press media play an integral role in the construction, promotion, and circulation of narratives about events and general in their choice of titles, influenced by a limited number of factors, including aesthetic considerations, marketing driver, and the personal preferences of the translators. This study challenges the common assumption that the choice of titles is purely arbitrary and instead demonstrates the complex interplay of factors at play in this process.

Despite the apparent randomness of the selection process, the study reveals a systematic approach that emerges from the data. It highlights the importance of understanding the social and cultural contexts in which titles are chosen, as well as the role of professional and personal networks in shaping these decisions. The findings contribute to a richer understanding of the way in which literary translations are produced and how they construct and reflect cultural identities in the process of translation.

Furthermore, the study also sheds light on the role of power dynamics in the selection process. It shows how the preferences of institutions, editors, and readers can shape the outcome, often resulting in a reinforcing of existing cultural hierarchies and biases. This insight is crucial for scholars and practitioners in the field of translation studies, as it underscores the need for critical evaluation of the selection process and its implications for the dissemination of cultural knowledge.

Finally, the study suggests that while there may be a lack of diversity in the selection of titles, there is a growing awareness of the importance of representing a wide range of voices and perspectives in the literary canon. As the field of translation continues to evolve, an increasing number of scholars and practitioners are advocating for a more inclusive approach to title selection, recognizing the potential of literature to bridge cultural divides and foster a greater understanding of different cultures and perspectives.

In conclusion, the study on the selection process of literary titles highlights the complexities and dynamics involved in this crucial aspect of translation. It reveals the importance of considering the social, cultural, and political contexts in which titles are chosen, as well as the role of power dynamics and the need for a more inclusive approach to title selection.

Reading through the study, one gains a deeper appreciation for the challenges and opportunities inherent in the process of bringing diverse voices to a global audience through literary translation.

In October 1928 Virginia Woolf was asked to deliver speeches at Newnham and Girton Colleges on the subject of 'Women and Fiction'; she spoke about her conviction that 'a woman must have money and a room of her own if she is to write fiction'. The following year, the two speeches were published as A Room of One's Own, and became one of the foremost feminist texts. Knitted into a polished argument are several threads of great importance – women and learning, writing and poverty – which helped to establish much of feminist thought on the importance of education and money for women's independence. In the same breath, Woolf brushes aside critics and sends out a call for solidarity and independence – a call which sent ripples well into the next century. ‘Brilliant interweaving of personal experience, imaginative musing and political clarity’ — Kate Mosse, The Guardian ‘Probably the most influential piece of non-fictional writing by a woman in this century.’ — Hermione Lee, The Financial Times
